HISTORY

The Leeds School Board buildings were designed in 1876 by renowned Victorian architect George Corson after winning an open competition under the alias 'Crayon'.

Built from local Burley and Pool Bank stone, the building opened in 1881 and served as the administrative centre for Leeds, where trainee teachers and children came for their examinations.

The showpiece was the Board Room with a gallery, 12 feet high walnut panelling and artworks commemorating Board Chairmen and Leeds dignitaries.

On the top floor, a vast top-lit examination hall had standing room for a thousand and gallery for one hundred. At 43 feet high, it had narrow aisles formed by the cast iron pillars supporting the arched ribs of the knave-like roof.

At the rear of the building is a hidden treasure; a cantilevered double-helix staircase, rising Escher-like to the examination rooms, intended to keep boys and girls apart, as well as inspiring children and teachers alike.

Leeds is one of the fastest growing cities in the UK with a population of 751,500 and a catchment of 5.3 million. It is the largest centre for financial and business services outside of London.

The city is approximately 11 miles south east of Leeds Bradford Airport, 10 miles north of Wakefield and 17 miles south of Harrogate. With the M1 and M62 intersection to its south and the A1(M) passing to the east, Leeds is one of the principle hubs of the northern motorway network.

Old School is situated at the very heart of Leeds city centre, being prominently located at the junction of Calverley Street with Great George Street in an area that forms part of the Leeds Innovation District.

The location is adjacent to Millennium Square and the retail and leisure core of Leeds city centre. The Light shopping centre is less than 5 minutes walk away as are many local bars and restaurants including the Alchemist, Sukothai, Gino D'Acampo and Electric Press.

Scheduled to open in November 2018 and sited in the lower ground floor of Old School, 'Assembly' is an underground street food market, with 6 food vendors changing on a regular basis, plus a craft beer hall from Hebden Bridge's Vocation Brewery.

That's not all – it will also have its own coffee bar, gin distillery and cocktail speakeasy, plus a calendar of events that will include live music, DJs, poets and performers.
